

EVALUATION DIMENSIONS FOR ARTICLES

(Adapted from O'Malley & Pierce, 1996:157-158)

The evaluation is not intended to judge the students' work but instead it is meant to provide supports for them to get better engaged/motivated in creating products and in joining the online interaction. For this reason, a holistic-impressionistic evaluation is chosen. It is based on the view of the constructivists that when more experience of language use is promoted, language reconstruction will take place. Note that the works have undergone correction by Language Tool (Grammarly and Plagiarism Checker).

1. Article Peer Evaluation Dimensions (Yellow Section)

When evaluating your friend's work you might want to write the following.

State the good things first:

This article is (good, excellent).

The part I like best is....

The areas to be improved (for instance):

Purpose clarity? Why?

Essay organization? Why?

Grammar? Why?

Mechanics/punctuation? Why?

Others? Why?

Write your evaluation in a complete paragraph.

2. Article LiC Evaluation Dimensions (Blue Section)

Since this online learning model carries high impact on “developmental” aspects, the lecturer is expected to provide more encouragement not judgments. The lecturer may want to look at such dimensions as:

1. State the interesting part of the writing
2. State if purpose is stated clearly.
3. State if it is properly organized. You can explore issues of coherence, cohesion, run-ons, and fragments.
4. Write if it has beginning, middle, and end.
5. Write if mechanics/format/punctuation is used properly.

Write your evaluation in a complete paragraph.

3. Article Self-Evaluation Dimensions (Green Section)

When you evaluate your own work in the Green section, look at these dimensions to guide you. Give feedback around the dimensions as much as you can.

1. Extend gratitude to peers and teacher
2. To evaluate, look at your article, your peer evaluation, and your teacher’s evaluation. Write strengths and weaknesses for improvement.
3. Reflect on things you can improve in the future.

Write your evaluation in a complete paragraph.
